Multi-Level Projects

- ✩ These projects are ideal for co-ops, large family or any other multi-age group of children.
- ✳ Choose a short story by O. Henry and rewrite it as a play to memorize and perform as a group for an audience of family members or parents.
- ✥ Create presentations on the geography and culture of some of the different countries you read about this unit such as Mexico, Africa, China and share your work with the others in your group. Make sure you have visuals with your presentations.
- ✩ From a book on the historical book list, dramatize an event from the life of Theodore Roosevelt.

Organizational/Time Management Skills

Do you have to be pushed and prodded to get your work done, or are you self-motivated? (If you are not sure, ask your parents!) Fortunately, if you have a problem in this area, it is within your grasp to improve if you have the desire. Keep the following points in mind as you evaluate and work to improve in this area:

1. Be honest in your self-evaluation. (Romans 12:3)
2. Be assured of God’s promise to aid us in our struggle for self-improvement. (Ezekiel 11:19-20, James 1:5)
3. Evaluate how you are spending your time. Do some activities need to be lessened or weeded out of your schedule completely? (Eph. 5:15-17)
4. Develop the habit of making better choices on a daily basis. (James 1:22-25)

Immigration Overview

We think of this period as Immigration and Industrialization, because of the leap in technology that revolutionized communication, building, manufacturing, agriculture and more. This unit covers the beginning of the first Transcontinental Railroad to before the First World War.

This time period, though brief, was one of great expansion and change for parts of the world. The industrialization that began in the 1700s in Britain, by the mid-1800s had transformed Western Europe and later, America, from primarily rural environments to urban communities. From Britain, industrialization spread to France, Belgium, Germany, America and Japan and divided the world into to two parts: those who had it, and those who didn’t. Sometimes those who had it ended up controlling those who didn’t and exploited them for their plentiful, raw materials. This mechanization had its downside. There were many, many people who no longer had jobs. On top of this, there were harvest failures, such as the Potato Famine in Ireland that caused widespread hunger. No wonder many of the unemployed, hungry Europeans made a beeline for the United States.

In America, the transcontinental railroad had connected the “new” states with the “old” states. Large factories and steel mills now marked the countryside. For 20-30 years after the Civil War, the nation moved toward manufacturing, harnessing the power of steam, iron and electricity.

Science and inventions dictated the day. From 1860 to 1890, the U. S. government issued 440,000 patents. By 1925, that number was close to a million! Thomas Edison, with his multitude of practical inventions such as the incandescent light bulb, changed the way people lived. Samuel F.B. Morse, the inventor of electrical telegraphy, linked the continent in communication the way the railroads did in transportation. The 1876 invention of the telephone by Alexander Graham Bell moved the nation forward both socially and economically. Business equipment inventions, such as the typewriter and cash register brought efficiency to new levels.

Another major area of advancement was the ore industry, most notably iron and steel. Andrew Carnegie, an Irish immigrant, brought amazing industrial expansion through his steel industry business.

Additionally, businessmen realized they could bring competing firms under one umbrella, and terms like “corporations” and “trusts” became common place. The corporations represented many different industries from the Standard Oil Company to Philip Armour’s meat-packing business, Armour & Company. Communication systems such as Western Union and Bell (telephone) System soon followed suit.

Towns and villages gave way to cities with factories, sprawling railroad yards and financial institutions. People flocked to the cities for work. By 1890, New York had a million and a half citizens and Philadelphia had over a million. Following the Civil War, some small towns like Omaha increased by fifty times the previous population!

Much of this population increase was due to the enormous influx of immigrants. While people came from all over the world for many different reasons, they frequently came from Europe to escape famine, poverty, political revolution and/or discrimination. Most of them ended up in the cities because of the abundant job opportunities.

The Statue of Liberty, a gift from France in 1886, was the most memorable sight for many immigrants that were processed through Ellis Island. They were scrutinized before being allowed to enter the U.S. primarily to be sure that they weren’t criminals running from the law. It was easier to get through successfully if they already had family in the U.S. to sponsor them. Once in America, immigrants had to find jobs, housing and learn the language. Housing expenses could be challenging and often 10 to 12 family members lived in one room. But the city offered cheap transportation with shop and factory jobs readily available.

A smaller number of immigrants headed west to farm or herd livestock, but land was becoming limited. The Homestead Act of 1862, granting free farms of 160 acres, had caused many Americans to head to the West. But by 1880, much of the land was taken by farmers, ranchers and miners.

Over five million people now lived where the buffalo used to graze freely. The railroad network advanced the settling process even more. Easy access to the West made ranching and farming that much more attractive. The cattle boom peaked around 1885, and then became more limited as the open range was covered with railroad tracks and fellow cattle drivers. Under the Homestead Act, farmers began fencing their claims, eliminating land on which cattle could be driven.

As much as industry was changing, farming changed as well. From 1860 to 1910, the number of farms in the U.S. tripled. American farmers grew enough to feed the entire country and still export goods. Advancements in farming equipment, such as reapers and threshing machines, allowed the farmers to produce more than ever. The science of farming expanded with agricultural colleges becoming established through the Morrill-Land Grant College Act. One of the most noted agriculture scientists, from Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, was George Washington Carver. He found hundreds of new uses for the peanut, the sweet potato, and the soybean.

By 1890, economic imbalance occurred with farm products heading downward and manufacturing increasing. This lead to organizations such as the Farmers’ Alliance, established to protect farmers, most commonly through political reform. The Alliance became so political that they developed a new political party, the Populists. By 1890, the party sent numerous senators and representatives to Congress. The Populists eventually embedded themselves in the Democratic Party. In the 1896 election, their candidate, William Jennings Bryant, lost to William McKinley. Despite the loss, Bryant went down in history as an incredible orator. McKinley, with his running mate, Theodore Roosevelt, won the 1900 election as well. However, McKinley was assassinated in 1901, moving Roosevelt into the Presidency.

By the turn of the century, the U.S. had changed drastically. People were spread all over the continent and sadly, the once wide-open frontier was history. Politically the nation had advanced to a world power. Free public education, free press, and religious
